A Planing Mill and Other Buildings Burned—Loss About $15,000.

Total Destruction of the Wm. Smith Furniture Building.

The List of "Missing" Increasing—A Touching Scene.

The Last Wrung.

DESTRUCTION OF A PLANING MILL, ETC.

The fiery element seemed to have been satiated last night with the devouring of the handsome block of buildings on the corner of Jefferson and Lake streets, and for eight hours were an exceedingly quiet portion of the city. Not a solitary engine was heard on the streets, not a single alarm was sounded, but right in the midst of the darkness and silence the fiend of destruction, apparently not satisfied with the havoc he had already made, was busily engaged in the work of destruction. Such a silence of bells is not usual in the dead hours of the night, and when it is added to the fact that the fire was in the midst of a large number of dwellings, and they were one and all filled with sleeping occupants, the wonder is that the fire was not attended with a fearful loss of life. Fortunately, however, this was not the case, and the fire, which was discovered at about 1 o'clock, was confined to the property on the corner of Lake and Jefferson streets, and destroyed it entirely. Wells street, between Polk and Taylor, and Jefferson and Canal, were also visited by the flames, but the work of destruction was not very extensive in either locality, the result of the fire department's efforts in preventing the spread of the flames. The fire was first discovered in the planing-mill of Wm. Smith, on the corner of Lake and Jefferson streets, and from there it spread to the adjoining buildings, which, with the exception of the brick block on the corner of Jefferson and Lake streets, were all of wood, and consequently an easy prey for the devouring element. The following is a list of the buildings destroyed, and the names of the occupants:

On the corner of Lake and Jefferson streets, a two-story frame building, occupied by Wm. Smith as a planing-mill, sash, door, and blind factory, and also as a dwelling. Adjoining this building, on Jefferson street, was a two-story frame building, occupied by Wm. Smith
